

DaVinci Sign Systems successfully completes contract with Denver Public Library

Windsor, CO – November 29, 2009. DaVinci Sign Systems recently completed a sign contract for the new expansion at the Denver Public Library. The contract included interior custom signage for the new library expansion. Construction began in August and the general contractor was Krahl Construction of Centennial, Colorado.

"There were many signage contractors involved in the initial bid of this project," states George D'Amico, sales associate with DaVinci. "Given our current economic market, getting this job required extra follow-up with the project general contractor," notes D'Amico. John Shaw, president of DaVinci adds "We are proud to have been part of this well-designed project for the Denver Public Library."

About DaVinci Sign Systems, Inc.

Headquartered in Windsor, Colorado, DaVinci Sign Systems was founded in 2004 by John JJ Shaw and partner Mark Foster. The two bring over 25 years of experience to their growing 25-member design-build sign company specializing in custom fabricated displays including electric, architectural, masonry, LED message centers, and other specialty signage. DaVinci covers Colorado and the entire Rocky Mountain region. The company successfully completed $3.2 million in sales in 2008 and sales for 2009 are steady, despite the current economy. For more information about DaVinci, visit: www.davincisign.com.